Crooks becomes a Grandfather--A Glimpse of his Home Life--Mr. G. R. Sims on A Morning with Will Crooks--Crooks's Daily Post-bag--Sample Letters--Speaking at Religious and Temperance Meetings--On Adult Sunday Schools--On the Licensing Bill--A Homily to Free Churchmen. By this time Crooks had moved from Northumberland Street to Gough Street, a few minutes walk away. The change was from a five-roomed house to a six-roomed house, with exactly three and a half feet more space for a garden at the back, as he jocularly described it. His two eldest daughters had both married, and his eldest son, who was doing well at the same trade his father learnt--that of cooper--had also settled down to married life in Poplar. This son had the pleasure one day of telephoning to his father at the County Council offices, just after the latter had passed his fiftieth birthday, You became a grandfather this morning. Cheer up! Another daughter qualified at the Cheltenham Training College as a school teacher. The youngest daughter elected to be mother's right hand at home. The youngest son was apprenticed in a Thames shipbuilding yard. Of his children he would often remark, during the controversy over religious education in schools, that they seemed to disprove the theories of both contending parties. One of his daughters and a son, who were educated in Board Schools, became communicating members of the Church of England, while two daughters educated in Church of England...
