Fox referred to the application of the system to tube railways. A. P. Trotter described experiments on electrolysis with alternating currents, concluding that there was not much ground for fear in this respect. He did not see the necessity for an auxiliary suspending wire, and expressed a preference for double insulation. P. Cardew advocated the adoption of a uniform system throughout Great Britain, and pointing out the possibility of obtaining a unidirectional current from an alternating-current system, with consequent electrolysis, he suggested that both poles of the system should be insulated, in which case the three-phase system might be preferable to the single-phase. W. M. Mordey said the Ward-Leonard single-phase system was not dead, and referred to the advantages of Stalloy in reducing the losses and heating in single-phase motors see Abstract No. 164 (1907). The absence of regeneration caused excessive losses...
